Reflection on the Gospel

Would you listen to someone whose profession everyone else looks down upon? Jesus calls himself a good shepherd and a gate. For a normal audience who did not know the nuances of such statements, they would take the message at the surface level.

Shepherds are notorious, despite being a needed profession. After all, they are raising goats and sheep needed for sacrifices. Reasons why shepherds are looked down upon are that they led their herds through the properties of others, grazing off the grass. Second reason is that shepherds had a rustic lifestyle, often staying outdoors and weren't the most hygienic, and often people avoid them.

Though the message wasn't understood by the Pharisees, whoever needed to hear Jesus' message followed him. A number of the religious leaders of the Jewish people had been leading the people astray. Through countless years, if the leaders' intentions don't align with God's, then they would be considered as thieves. Probably hinting at a more financial abuse towards believers.

How about us? How can we be like sheep? Knowing the master's voice and following him takes different forms. How about the message we already heard? Unlike sheep, we can decide to listen whenever we want. What is intrinsic in all of us is the ability to do good, something that is part of our created being. God's word speaks to us through scripture and ways that move the Spirit within us.
